Village of McCook named “Public Body of the Year” Award by the Construction Industry Service Corporation

McCook, IL –Cook County Commissioner and Mayor of McCook, Jeff Tobolski

“I will continue to be a strong advocate for the unions and middle class to ensure additional jobs for working families in Illinois.” Commissioner Tobolski

Mayor Jeffrey Tobolski, who is also the 16th District Cook County Commissioner, accepted the “Public Body of the Year” award from The Construction Industry Service Corporation (CISCO) during its 2017 annual awards ceremony. The awards are part of CISCO's annual Pride in Construction Award Program, which recognizes the top quality union construction projects in several categories and honors the efforts of an area educator, labor advocate, and an Illinois public body.

The “Public Body of the Year” award is given each year to a municipality that exemplifies the labor association’s mission of converging on efforts to enhance the competitiveness of union construction while building on the existing trust among the numerous trades. The Mayor was praised for his leadership, both in the Village of McCook and as a County Commissioner, for generating coalitions and furthering the initiatives of the union trades throughout Cook County.

“I am grateful and honored to accept this award on behalf of the Village of McCook,” Tobolski said. “I appreciate CISCO’s efforts to work supportively to facilitate the exchange of ideas between contractors, building trades union leaders, and the municipalities throughout the state of Illinois.”

CISCO, headquartered in Oak brook, is a non-profit labor management association focused on uniting union construction labor and management representatives together to work cooperatively in order to better the construction industry.
